BOTANICAL GARDEN

Plants are a valuable resource in Botswana. They bear edible fruits, provide resting sites for birds, shade and shelter for insects, birds and other animals. They are also used for medicine. They supply material for the manufacture of goods such as paper and furniture. They even keep us alive by supplying the very oxygen that we breathe. Increasing demand of the world's flora by a growing human population threatens many plant species. With extinction or reduction to levels that are not environmentally viable.

At the National Botanical Garden in Gaborone, we offer a repository for these threatened species by collecting and nurturing wild indigenous plants, particularly plants that are endemic or rare. This includes involvement in diversity conservation in areas such as botany, ecology, horticulture, ecosystems, species recovery programmes and environmental education/awareness.

As well, the National Botanical Garden aims to increase awareness of and implement international agreements that are aimed at the sustainable use of plant resources, such as the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (CITES) and the Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD)

At the national level, the National Botanical Garden works closely with local herbaria (PSUB,UCBG,), The national Plant Genetic Resource Centre, Department of Forestry and Range Resources, Department of Environmental Affairs and NGOs such as Kalahari Conservation Society (KCS), Veld Products Research and Development as well as plant nurseries.

The National Botanical Garden is a unit of the Natural History Division in the Department of National Museum and Monuments. It covers an area of of 9 hectares that have been divided intocultivated and wild sections.

A preliminary checklist of the plants in the National Botanical Garden shows that there are about 116 species in 54 families. In addition to growing and displaying indigenous plants, the National Botanical Garden also oversees Important Plant Areas (IPA) throughout the country. These include Lithops, the Gutsaa baobab at Gweta, Sokwe Botanical Reserve at Serowe and Makosho trees at Lecheng.

The National Botanical Garden has a number of trails where Botswana's indigenous plants can be viewed. Also in the grounds is a visitor centre that houses exhibitions on our collections and the National Herbarium where our collections of preserved plant parts are kept.

There is also a kiosk and rest rooms are accessible by wheel chairs. Self guided tours do not require bookings. However, guided tours are by appointment. Security and reception officers should be contacted for more information.
Please note that there are rock outcrops, open areas of water, thorny trees and poisonous plants. Visitors are advised to exercise caution especially when they have children with them.

The national Botanical Garden is a living plant collection and is for visitors to enjoy.
